Not illustrated. 1878 Excerpt: .now since he had begun earnestly to live less to himself and more to the glory of God! His life would be always tinged with sadness; but now he had much to cheer him in the success of his efforts for the good of others, and her heart was lifted up in thankfulness to God, for His goodness towards him. Then many scenes of her life in India passed in review before her, and she thought of Gerard, who had been so nearly lost to her, but whom God had restored, now doubly her brother. Her thoughts lingered pleasantly, too, over the change in Lord Dasserdale, and then involuntarily they passed to the sermon of the last Sunday evening, and the use it had been of to the lonely widow. Deeply absorbed in this kind of dreamy meditation, she had not noticed any one entering the room till the harmonium was thrown open, and some one sat down to play; then she looked round and saw that it was Sydney Trelayne. He had not perceived the shadow of her light dress behind the white curtain; and as she was not before aware that music could be reckoned among his talents, Lady Victorine was reluctant to risk the chance of hearing him, by making him aware of her presence. First, he played over a soft plaintive chant; then, in a voice not very strong, but decidedly sweet, he commenced to sing. With such deep feeling did he...
